A Message From the IHS President

Mapping Indiana has been in preparation for more than a decade, and I think you will agree that it was worth the wait. It reflects some of the wonderful maps from archival collections of the Indiana Historical Society that have come to us since our founding in 1830—not long after Indiana became a state in 1816. This beautiful volume is being released as one of the many services and programs created by our institution to observe the state bicentennial, and will have enduring value beyond 2016.

We are very grateful for the financial support provided by the generous donors, who are listed below, and the unending care and devotion of our Archives and Library staff, who care for these and other millions of important documents and photographs that tell Indiana's story.

Sincerely,

John A. Herbst

on the enlarged North American continent is "a more protruding Virginia than usual."[3] The language applied on the map is Latin, while its title, printed on the verso, appears in French. The Latin text within the inset toward the lower left reads, "Modus consiciendi & bibendi potum apud Americanos in Brasilia," making reference to the clever image of some Native Americans in Brazil preparing and drinking an alcoholic beverage derived from the manioc root. A pair of birds look on, perched observantly above.[4] The dramatic impact of the illustrative panel does draw attention to the lower left corner and slightly away from the subject, though the overall beauty of the map still leaves a lasting impression of Hondius and his contributions to mapmaking (Figure 7a).

Robert Gray's discovery and naming of the Columbia River in 1792 and Meriwether Lewis and William Clark's journey (1804–6) confirming the waterway's limited length the Pacific west coast and extending southward, references are given to one English land discovery and to several Spanish conquests. Definitely a lesser-known region, the area around northern California was named New Albion by Sir Francis Drake in 1579 while circumnavigating the globe under orders to "destroy" and "plunder" any
